Problem:

recognition that youth work gives an added value to the youth workers

Erasmus+

Main aspects:

the perception that Youth Work, volunteering and Erasmus+/ESC projects are like holidays or entertainment, without any added value for the future personal development.

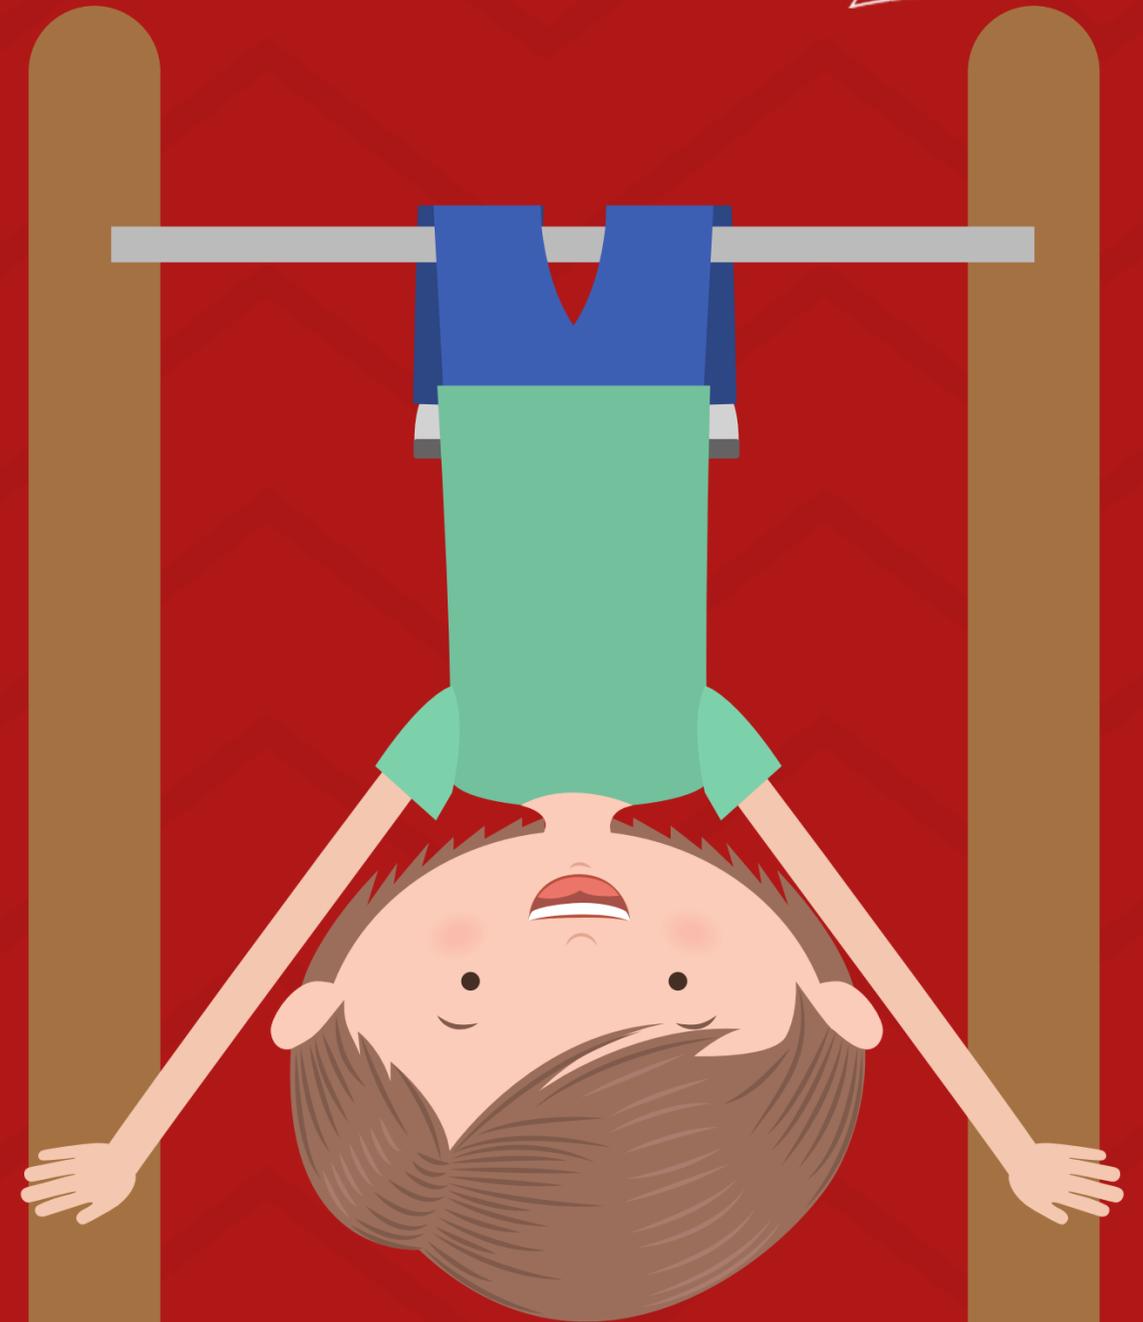

Erasmus+

The perception is also spread among society where youth work, volunteering and experiences like Erasmus+ are just "less" important than regular academic experience or internships.

Erasmus+

Strategy applied with families and institutions:

Meetings in schools and youth centers in collaboration with educators, where volunteering and youth work are presented as part of the educational path as activities complementary to regular education and job trainings.

Erasmus+

Strategy with the youth workers:

- Onboarding process similar to the one of professional or academical activities, we think that requiring a "professional" presentation and running a face-to-face interview will help the young people to perceive that the opportunity offered requires the same attention and cure in presenting themselves and their personal motivations.
- Follow up including meetings with social enterprises, local stakeholders and professional studies in order to promote, in the labour market of the third sector, the skills of the participants and their achievements during the mobilities, especially the long term ones.

Erasmus+

Strategy in the society:

Meetings with local stakeholders, social cooperatives and enterprises not familiar with European projects and Youth Work but could benefit from it: former volunteers and participants present their experience, their projects and most of all what they have realized and how, underlining the skills and abilities developed. In this way the possible employees can understand that those international initiatives are not "light" activities but in most of the cases they contribute to improve the skills of the participants in a complementary way to the academical education or professional internships in a profit entity.

Erasmus+

Promotion of the skills and abilities developed during volunteering and youth work activities as crucial feature for a better job quality and environment (so called soft-skills).

Professionalization of Youth Work standards of onboarding, activities and follow-up with a strong connection with Third Sector demand.
